

PLACES TO VISIT

A visitor guide to New Zealand's rich historic buildings and sites in the South Island cared for by the New Zealand Historic Places Trust.

1 Rai Valley Cottage

Colonial life forced settlers to acquire new skills. At Rai Valley London-trained architect and surveyor Charles Turner felled bush, worked on new roads and pit-sawed totara timber to build this humble cottage for his family in the 1880s. They were the only family in the valley for a decade, so self-sufficiency was their sole option. Tilly Turner kept their four children and passing travellers fed with home-grown vegetables.

2 Fyffe House & Pou

Kaikoura's connection with whales goes back to 14th-century Māori. Fyffe House, the oldest surviving local building, honours the connection. Built in 1842 by whaler Robert Fyffe, the original two-room cottage rests on whalebone foundations. The house was extended by his cousin George Fyffe by 1860 and remains largely unchanged today. The site, with its charming cottage garden, is en route to the seal colony and enjoys a spectacular outlook over the ocean and the Kaikoura Ranges. A carved pou (pole) depicts Tangaroa, God of the Sea.

3 Brunner Industrial Site

The West Coast and coal mining are inextricably linked, with a history of both highs and lows. After pioneering explorer Thomas Brunner's discovery in 1840, New Zealand's first, highly productive commercial mine opened in 1864. Sadly, 65 lives were lost in the country's worst mining tragedy in 1869. Walkways, interpretive panels and a restored 1876 suspension bridge over the Grey River make exploring ruins of coal mining structures and rare internationally significant beehive coke ovens easy and lively.

4 Seddon House Site

Colourful 'King Dick' Seddon never forgot the foundations of his political career were strongly tied to the West Coast; the remaining foundations of his house are a tangible link. New Zealand's longest serving Prime Minister (1893-1906), the popular Liberal politician was influential in establishing New Zealand's family farm economy, the early welfare state and votes for New Zealand women. Read Seddon stories on the interpretive panel at the house.

5 Coton's Cottage

Significant as a typical farm dwelling on a Canterbury small holding, Coton's Cottage was built in 1864. Bentley and Sarah Coton built a cob cottage - a mixture of local clay and tussock - with five rooms and an attic bedroom. After many years of disrepair, the property became a historic reserve in 1974. The Hororata Historical Society re-used some of the original materials in renovating the cottage, and furnished it with typical 19th-century household effects.

Damaged in the September 2010 earthquake, the building is closed for repairs. Visit the museum on site by arrangement.

6 Te Manunui / Frenchman's Gully Rock Art

Early Māori travelled the South Canterbury limestone landscape during the last 700 years, leaving New Zealand's largest collection of rock drawings on impressionable smooth walls of overhangs and caves. Dated at over 200 years old, 'birdman' figures are clearly visible. One figure with a human torso and bird-like upper body displays birds on outstretched arms. Other drawings suggest fish and dog figures, and mythical taniwha.

7 Craigmore Rock Shelter

The importance of moa to Māori food hunters is shown in these ancient images of three giant moa, in the Valley of the Moa (O Wahi Moa). Drawn with charcoal and ochre on a limestone rock shelter by the Waitaha people who camped in the shelters up to 1000 years ago, the images are inexorably fading through environmental effects. Revel in the beauty and grandeur of the surrounding landscape on your walk to the site.

8 The Cuddy

Still in their teens, the three Studholme brothers arrived from Cumberland in 1854 and set about building a simple, sturdy cottage on the family's Te Waimate sheep station, which is still owned by the Studholme family. With no sawn timber available, the ingenious brothers used vertical totara slabs, plugged with cob. A tribute to its sound construction with a beaten clay floor and thatched roof with maire rafters, the cottage is remarkably intact.

9 The Levels

This unassuming totara and cob cottage has a cameo role in New Zealand farming heritage. Built by George Rhodes in 1851, the earthen-floored cottage provided temporary housing on South Canterbury's first sheep station. The Levels station was also the site from which the legendary James Mackenzie rustled sheep only to be caught heading for the high country. The region became a significant sheep farming area, contributing substantially to New Zealand's agriculture.

10 Hayes Engineering Works

The inventive mind of Ernest Hayes is evident in his well-preserved workshop, established in 1895, and restored 1920s homestead. An early exponent of 'Kiwi ingenuity', Hayes developed and marketed products to improve farming life, including wire fence strainers, cattle stops and pulley blocks. His mud brick family home was fitted with modern inventions like electricity, piped radio, and quirky laundry and bathroom facilities. The site also includes a small museum. Campervan friendly, this is a great Otago Rail Trail refreshment stop.

11 Ophir Post Office

Prized by collectors, letters posted from the stylish Ophir Post Office carry the original VR (Victoria Regina) rubber stamp postmark. Featuring local schist masonry and striking arched plaster quoins, this optimistic 1886 construction missed the town's gold mining heyday. Check out extreme weather observations in a local diary, and peek into the tiny jailhouse at the far end of the pretty garden.

12 Totara Estate

New Zealand is said to be founded on the sheep's back, and Totara Estate is central to this history. An innovative large sheep and grain station, Totara's own slaughterhouse provided the first shipment of mutton frozen aboard the sailing ship Dunedin sent to England in 1882. Restored Oamaru stone farm buildings, vintage agricultural artefacts and interpretive displays offer insights into the estate's working history and place in New Zealand's economic development.

13 Clark's Mill

Originally built as a water-powered mill for nearby Totara Estate in 1866, this impressive Oamaru stone mill is the only surviving mill of its type in New Zealand. Oats and wheat are important crops in this region, and the mill remained in production until 1976. During summer, on the last Sunday of the month (check website for details) the 19th-century machinery grinds back into life amid the noise and drama early millers experienced.

14 Matanaka Farm Buildings

Johnny Jones was a true pioneering entrepreneur, establishing Matanaka Farm in 1843 as well as a whaling station and shipping company. He promoted the Waikouaiti area for settlement in his native Sydney. His farm buildings are New Zealand's oldest, despite their windy, isolated cliff-top site which tells of the tough life resilient early migrants faced. The stables retain their original 'Patented Galvanised Tinned Iron Roof'. Visitors can only wonder at the unique three-seat privy. Enjoy the scenic walk through farmland (please keep to the track).

15 Southland Provincial Council Building

Invercargill's most historic building, this well-proportioned building has seen many uses and been part of the development of Southland as a separate province. In 1866 the newly formed Southland Provincial Council bought it from the original Masonic Lodge owners, and it subsequently has been home to the Otago government and the Invercargill Borough Council. The classical façade with its plaster quoins and arched windows has remained intact and the building currently houses an upmarket fashion boutique.

16 Clifden Bridge

At 111.5 metres long, with 27 steel cables on 7.5 metre towers and concrete pillars resembling stone, the elegant Clifden Suspension Bridge is New Zealand's longest. Built in 1899 to provide safe passage over the swift Waiau River, the bridge was a transport lifeline for early settlers. A new bridge built nearby in 1978 saw this bridge closed to traffic. The bridge is easily viewed from the riverbank and attractive picnic spots are nearby. Fundraising to strengthen and re-open the historic bridge for pedestrians is underway.

Hayes Engineering Works and Ophir township are conveniently located near to each other for car travellers to create their own mini heritage trail.

Totara Estate and Clark's Mill share much of their history, and together create their own mini heritage trail for travellers by car. Make Oamaru a stopping point on your journey, where the historic precinct encourages you to learn more about Victorian New Zealand.

Hayes Engineering Open Days

Experience Hayes Engineering Works in fully operational mode - the machinery at the Works is demonstrated periodically throughout the day. Walk through the factory to learn more about entrepreneurial Ernest Hayes and his intrepid wife, Hannah.

Then tour through the homestead with its own fascinating quirks and stories.

Refreshments are available in our café, or bring a picnic to enjoy in the grounds. Plenty of parking for cars and cyclists.

South Island.

What makes New Zealand the place it is?

A dynamic young country, New Zealand has a unique heritage and culture. The South Island, Te Wai Pounamu, was once the country's economic development powerhouse, and its historic places and buildings reflect this history.

Farms at the heart of New Zealand's colourful meat industry, industrial sites of innovation and tragedy, whaling and other maritime sites as well as ancient Māori rock art, all tell our stories. Individually and collectively, they offer visitors insights into the struggles and achievements of early days in a new country, and tales to spark the imagination.

Cared for by the New Zealand Historic Places Trust, each featured heritage place adds colour to New Zealand's history. Presented in an increasingly interactive way, these treasures will enrich your understanding of New Zealand's diverse culture, both yesterday and today. Make them a highlight of your travelling plans!

The properties featured here are just a small selection of the many fascinating heritage places located throughout the South Island of New Zealand. To obtain further details of where to go and how to get there, visit our website, contact the properties listed, the New Zealand Historic Places Trust or call into any visitor information centre.
